

Adverse Possession in Nova Scotia

The Department of Justice frequently receives inquiries about land claims based on Adverse Possession.

All Nova Scotia landowners should be aware of the doctrine of Adverse Possession or “squatters’ rights”.

Simply put, if a property owner allows someone to use their land without their permission and that use continues for 20 years, the title holder is at risk of the “squatter” making a claim for ownership of the land. A claim for possessory title could be by a neighbour whose driveway crosses a piece of the adjacent property or by members of a family who have occupied their home for generations without ever having a deed.

A claim for adverse possession is very difficult to make. It must be based on convincing evidence that the claimant’s use of the land was “open, notorious, continuous and exclusive”, meaning that the use was visible and public such that it would be known in the community, that there were no breaks in the occupation and that no one else was using the land including the owner. A claimant also must also normally show that the use was of all the land being claimed and that they have treated the land as theirs without regard for the interest of the person with legal ownership. The use must be without permission.

If the land being claimed is Crown lands the period of possession that must be shown is 40 years.

Landowners need to be careful to protect their ownership by giving clear permission whenever they allow others to use their land. Use with the owner’s consent under a lease, license or other agreement does not give rise to a claim of adverse possession.

Anyone intending to make a claim to land by adverse possession and anyone concerned about losing ownership to a “squatter” should consult a lawyer for advice as the legal principles are complex and can be confusing.
